PENTECOST 24. NOVEMBER 04, 2018

This week, we celebrated two of the greatest feasts of the liturgical year: the feast of all the Saints and the feast of All Souls. In early November, we remember this long chain of witnesses who preceded us ... Indeed, psychologists claim that the memory of those who have been important in our lives contribute to building our identity. The people we have forgotten are not really influencing us, while those we remember and who have played a role in our lives continue to influence us long after they leave.

If Christianity is missionary in its essence, it is above all because of the commandment of love. For if we are disciples of Jesus, then we cannot remain indifferent to all around us. We cannot remain silent and inactive in the places where we live. All opportunities are good to get in touch with others. The scribe in our today's gospel became Jesus' disciple. He understood that the most important thing is to love God by serving and loving one another. Thus the greatest of the commandments is double, or rather, the two commandments form one. They are both needed in the lives of the faithful, as it takes two legs to walk. Christian life is therefore to love the Lord God with all our strength by loving our neighbor.
